You're with your 10-year-old child, Jordan, at a medical appointment. After running some diagnostic tests, Dr. Baker recommends that Jordan starts a new treatment and presents some information that conflicts with information you've learned in the past. Dr. Baker seems to be rushing through the conversation.

1. Start The Conversation

Ask for help with the conversation. Include someone who your care recipient respects, but isn't the main caregiver. Sometimes the closest caregiver gets the most push back on this conversation. You can also ask your doctor or a trusted professional to start the conversation.

- Try not to force a decision.
- Remind them it is completely their choice.

Have you ever said...

"She has the same experiences/the same condition/the same diagnosis and she doesn't act this way."

"Everything that he has been through doesn't mean he can act like that."

"He is so oppositional/defiant/manipulative."

"I have been through worse and I turned out okay."

"He has the skills, he's just choosing not to use them."
